

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

FOURTH ROYAL IRISH DRAGOON GUARDS.

AFTER the Revolution and disbanding of the army in 1698, the English cavalry consisted of Life Guards, Horse Grenadier Guards, Horse, and Dragoons, the latter being trained to fight on foot as well as on horseback, and receiving less pay than the other cavalry. In 1746 the 3rd and 4th troops of Horse Guards were disbanded, and three regiments of horse reduced to the pay and service of dragoons, the latter receiving as some compensation for their loss of pay, the title of Dragoon Guards, and being given precedence over all simple dragoons. In 1788 four regiments of Irish Horse were similarly reduced, and added to the establishment of Dragoon Guards. Thus the 1st regiment of Irish Horse became the 4th regiment of Dragoon Guards, and the 4th regiment of Irish Horse, the 7th Dragoon Guards. These regiments of Irish Horse were also denominated by their facings, the first, (4th Dragoon Guards), being called "The Blue Horse," the second, (5th Dragoon Guards), "The Green Horse," &c. &c.

The 4th Dragoon Guards were much distinguished during the Irish rebellion in 1798, particularly at the battle of Naas on the 24th May, when the royal troops were commanded by the Earl of Gosford, and defeated the insurgents with great slaughter. They also served in the Peninsula from 1811 to 1813, under the command of Colonel Sherlock, an experienced soldier, who had exhibited high military qualities in Holland and the Cape of Good Hope, when Major in the 23rd Dragoons; but the crowning deeds of the Royal Irish were at Balaklava on the 25th October, 1854, when they decided the success of the heavy cavalry brigade, and this feat of arms is deserving of particular mention.

The heavy cavalry brigade of the British army on the memorable 25th Oct., 1854, was composed of the 4th and 5th Dragoon Guards, Royals, Greys, and Enniskillens. The whole, numbering 922 horses, being under the command of the Hon. Major General Scarlett. Some Turkish redoubts had been taken by the Russians in the early part of the day, and the brigade were directed to retire out of the range of the guns, now directed upon them from the captured redoubts.

The brigade marched in two columns, the 4th Dragoon Guards and Royals under Colonel Hodge,* forming the left column; while the Greys, Enniskillens, and 5th Dragoon Guards, under the immediate direction of Major General Scarlett, formed the right column.

Little time had elapsed after the capture of the redoubts, when dense masses of Russian cavalry, estimated at 3,500 sabres, appeared upon the crest of the hill in rear of the British brigade. There was no opportunity of referring to higher authority; the gallant general of the brigade and his subordinate commanders were left to the exercise of their own judgment, and well did they justify the confidence which had been placed in their bravery and discretion.

Scarlett, without hesitation, put the rear column about, and leading forward the Greys and Enniskillens with the 5th Dragoon Guards in second line, dashed into the imposing masses of his formidable assailants, and drove them back. Hodge, in like manner, reversed his order of march, and, seeing that the right flank of the attacking column was unprotected, inclined to his left, formed line to the front, and coming unexpectedly upon the enemy's exposed right flank with an impetus which could not be resisted, completely rolled up the opposing mass, the gallant Royal Irish interposing between the enemy and the Greys, who would otherwise been overwhelmed by superior numbers.

While this was going forward on the Russian right, their left flank was attacked by a squadron of the Enniskillens, and the whole, panic stricken by the unexpected charge of the 4th Dragoon Guards, broke and fled: even their strong reserves made no effort to arrest the flight, and Scarlett's gallant brigade had thus the distinguished honor of plucking the first laurel from the Muscovite horse on the memorable field of Balaklava.

It may be mentioned, as a remarkable coincidence, that two representatives of Royal houses served in the 4th Dragoon Guards. Paul Ruffo, Prince of Castelcicala, and for many years Neapolitan Minister at the court of London, held the rank of Lieutenant in the regiment, having been previously wounded at Waterloo in the Enniskillens; and Sir Augustus d'Este, son of H. R. H. the Duke of Sussex, was a Major in the corps. Among distinguished scientific, and literary members, may be named Lieutenant-Colonel BEAMISH and Major MAKEPEACE, the former author of the History of the King's German Legion, and other standard military works; and both of whom took high certificates at the Senior Departments of the Royal Military College, Sandhurst.

* Son of the gallant Major Hodge, 7th Hussars, who fell at Genappe, while leading a charge of his regiment against the Polish Lancers, 17th June, 1815.

ENTRY OF THE FOURTH DRAGOON GUARDS INTO LEEDS,

Thursday, July 24th, 1856.

Precisely at one o'clock the troops, with Col. Hodge at their head, and officered by Captain Gunter, Captain Clarke, Lieut. Webb, Lieut. Wilkinson, Lieut. Muttlebury, and Mr. Macnamara, (surgeon), trotted briskly to the spot where the Mayor, the Artillery, and the procession were awaiting them, and were received by the Foundry Band playing "The Conquering Hero." Their appearance was the signal for vociferous cheers, which were taken up and repeated again and again along the entire route to the barracks. The Dragoons were received by the Royal Artillery with military honours. Colonel Hodge shook hands heartily with the Mayor, and then introduced his brother officers to his Worship, to Major Frazer, &c. Almost immediately afterwards the procession began to move forward to the barracks, passing along Hunslet-lane, up Briggate, down Lowerhead-row, along North-street, and into Chapel-town-road. The order of the procession was as follows:—

POLICE.

Smith's Brass and Fife and Drum Bands.

BANNERS.

181 Gentlemen on horseback, three a-breast.

Woodhouse and Kirkstall Drum and Fife Bands.

14 Aldermen and Councillors, mounted, two a-breast.

Gigs, carts, and other vehicles.

Cliff's Band.

Carriages, coaches, and other vehicles.

Mounted Railway Corps.

Railway Corps' Waggon, with Milburn's Band, and large inscription, "'The Heavy Brigade,' the men who carry the day—Carver and Co., Pickford and Co., Chaplin and Horne, R. and J. Boyes, W. and T. Pepper, John Pepper.

106 wherry-men, mounted on powerful horses, gaily decorated, and headed on horseback by the carting agents of the Railway Companies, including Mr. J. Pepper, Mr. W. Pepper, Mr. T. Pepper, Mr. Boyes, and others.

Miscellaneous vehicles.

Along the whole route from Hunslet to the Barracks, the streets were crowded with spectators, whose hearty cheers gave evidence of most sincere and joyous welcome to the troops, which the Dragoons again and again returned by outbursts of cheering and waving their swords in the air. The balconies and windows of all the houses were also thronged with well-dressed people, who entered into the spirit of the demonstration, the ladies waving their handkerchiefs, and the gentlemen cheering lustily the brave troops who have come among us. But streets, and windows, and balconies did not suffice for the anxious multitudes; and house-tops, and walls, and temporary platforms, found occupants anxious to catch a glimpse at the passing cavalcade. As the Dragoons passed along they had bouquets showered upon them from the windows, and ere they reached the Barracks, they and their horses were gaily decorated with evergreens and flowers by the friendly hands of those walking beside them. When nearly opposite the Grammar School, in North-street, a wreath of laurel was thrown from the window of Mrs. Sheward (the widow of a Waterloo soldier), to the gallant Colonel Hodge, who, catching it upon his sword, amidst the most enthusiastic plaudits of the spectators, placed it round his helmet, and thus displayed the emblem of honour during the remainder of the triumphal march. Within a few yards of this interesting scene, another wreath of laurel was thrown towards the officers, and on being picked up by Mr. O'Callaghan, that gentleman, amidst the hearty cheers of the people, gracefully placed it upon the helmet of Captain Gunter.

To estimate the number of persons crowding the route, with any degree of accuracy, would be impossible; but we must be quite within the mark if we say that there could not be less than 120,000 spectators of the entry of the 4th Dragoon Guards into Leeds. The procession was the most imposing probably ever met with in Leeds; and its length was so great that it occupied fully half an hour in passing a given point. To those in procession, the immense concourse of people in the streets, the crowds filling every window covering every platform, and occupying hundreds of roofs, could scarcely have presented a more animated and gratifying spectacle.

The procession arrived at the Barracks about 2 o'clock, when, in accordance with previous arrangement, the equestrians and vehicles passed through the Barrack-yard, from the Chapeltown to the Roundhay roads. Those gentlemen who had taken tickets for the luncheon subsequently returned on foot.

DINNER TO THE OFFICERS.

The programme of arrangements included the entertainment of the officers to a banquet, and the non-commissioned officers and privates to a substantial dinner. The banquet took place in a large marquee in the artillery ground, which had been erected for the purpose. About two hundred gentlemen sat down. The Mayor and the officers entered the tent at 20 minutes to three, and were loudly cheered, the audience rising en masse. His Worship immediately took the chair, at a cross table, and on his right were Colonel Hodge, Rev. W. Sinclair, incumbent of St. George's, Captains Jones, Clarke, and Gunter of the 4th Dragoons, P. O'Callaghan, Esq., Lieutenant Gillespie, R.A., Lieutenant Joyce, R.A., Lieutenant Llewellyn, R.A., Assistant Surgeon Macnamara of the 4th Dragoons, and John Hope Shaw, Esq. On his left were the Hon. Major Fraser, John Gott, Esq., Mr. Hinchman, Lieuts. Wilkinson, Bragg, Webbe, and Muttelbury, of the 4th Dragoons, Major Sampson, Staff Officer, and Capt. Pollard of the 4th West York. The vice-chair was occupied by Robert Barr, Esq., and amongst the other clergy and gentlemen present were, the Rev. W. T. Dixon, Rev. N. Greenwell, Rev. H. Gibbanks, Captain Child, barrack master, Joseph Bateson, Esq., Reginald D. Marshall, Esq., Arthur Marshall, Esq., J. H. Riddale, Esq., Wm. Firth, Esq., George Young, Esq., John Young, Esq., Christopher Kemplay, Esq., J. I. Ikin, Esq., J. A. Ikin, Esq., W. St. J. Wheelhouse, Esq., R. Frost, Esq., E. J. Maude, Esq., J. D. Holdforth, Esq., J. W. Leather, Esq., E. W. Atkinson, Esq., T. G. Teake, Esq., H. Richardson, Esq., F. Ferns, Esq., W. H. Gaunt, Esq., R. Tennant, Esq., S. Ratcliffe, Esq., J. O. Butler, Esq., J. Penny, Esq., Samuel Smith, Esq., Dr. Smith, W. N. Price, Esq., J. E. Upton, Esq., W. N. H. Myers, Esq., M. Cawood, Esq., Councillors Botterill, Neill, Kaye, and Naylor, &c.

After dinner, the MAYOR gave "The Queen," observing that she was one of the most military monarchs they had had, and one who had endeared herself to her soldiers by the way in which she had received her Crimean heroes. The toast having been duly honoured, his Worship gave "Prince Albert, Albert Prince of Wales, and the rest of the Royal family." The toast was drunk with the usual honours.

On again raising the MAYOR proposed the health of the Bishop and Clergy of the diocese.

The Rev. W. SINCLAIR responded.

The MAYOR then rose to propose the next toast. He said—Mr. Vice-Chairman and gentlemen, I have now the honour of proposing to you what may be emphatically considered the toast of the day—"The health of the army and navy, and of the heroes of the Crimea, coupled with the name of Colonel Hodge." (Loud Applause.) And I have no doubt, from the symptoms already exhibited, that this toast will be responded to with the utmost enthusiasm. (Hear, hear.) We have just, by the blessing of Providence, concluded a short but a very glorious war—a war undertaken on the high principle of assisting the weak and almost helpless, of assisting the sick man (applause); and also on the principle of securing national independence, and we all know that national independence leads to the independence of the people. But our aspirations and our endeavours would have utterly failed if we had been without the help and the assistance of those brave men whom you have welcomed so nobly to-day—(loud cheers)—and many of whom you now see sitting round this hospitable board. (Applause.) Nothing could exceed the gallant behaviour of the army in the glorious fields of the East. When the tempest shook their tents, and when disease and calamity in the shape of cholera carried death amongst their ranks—all these sufferings were borne with patient endurance, and in no single instance with any breach of discipline; and nothing could exceed, or will do so, the glory which has been exhibited by the army in this part of our history as a nation. (Applause.) When I think of Balaklava, and of the noble charge made there by the heavy cavalry—a charge which has been distinguished as one of the most splendid events in the whole war and in our history, I cannot sufficiently express my feelings. Gentlemen, we have now the honour of the presence of Colonel Hodge, who led the "Heavies" on that occasion—who led the whole brigade—and whose performances were described by an eye-witness as "a charge like that of a sharp instrument entering a pulpy body, and scattering confusion in every direction." (Applause.) We have also the estimate of Lord Raglan, who said that the charge of this brigade was one of the most successful he had ever witnessed; it was never doubtful, and is in the highest degree creditable to Brigadier-General Scarlett and the officers and men engaged in it. I need not say a single word more in favour of the toast I have named, but leave it to you to honour it in the manner to which it is entitled. With respect to that part of the toast which refers to the navy, there is not so much to be said. The fleet during the late war was not so regularly engaged on the sea as to bring them so prominently before the public as they deserve. A great many of our brave sailors however, did gallant duty on shore during that memorable siege, both in bringing up material from the fleet, and in working the batteries. They are therefore entitled to a due share of your expression of feeling in the reception of this toast. I shall conclude by saying with the bard (Campbell):—

"Britannia needs no bulwarks,
No tower along the steep;
Her march is on the mountain wave,
Her home is on the deep."

The toast was then drunk with great enthusiasm.

Col. HODGE, on rising, was received with loud and repeated cheering. He said—Mr. Mayor and Gentlemen of Leeds, I beg to thank you most sincerely for the enthusiastic manner in which you have been kind enough to receive the toast which has just been given; and I also trust that you will convey to the inhabitants of Leeds how sincerely grateful I and my brother officers feel for the manner in which we have been received in your town this day. (Applause.) No Roman triumph ever could have exceeded the scene we have this day witnessed. It came from a free people; and I did not see a single scowl upon the countenance of any one of the 120,000 persons assembled this day. (Hear, hear.) Everybody's heart seemed to greet us, and I thank them sincerely for it.

I wish, Gentlemen, that the task, the pleasing task, of responding to this toast had fallen on one who felt himself more able to perform it—(no, no)—and I feel before me that line of steel [the reporters] which it is most difficult to overcome, and I hope those gentlemen will be merciful to me. (Laughter and cheers.) Gentlemen, the Mayor has kindly mentioned the manner in which the heavy brigade conducted themselves at the battle of Balaklava, and I hope you will excuse me if I endeavour to set you right on one thing. You have given me credit for what I do not deserve; you have given me credit for leading the heavy brigade on that occasion—the credit is due to Sir James Scarlett. The letter which has been read by the Mayor refers to two regiments: those regiments Major Scarlett led into the very thickest of the Russian columns. Two other regiments were equally engaged, and I flatter myself that the services rendered that day by the 4th Dragoon Guards—(cheers)—were in no way inferior to those rendered by the Enniskillens and the Greys. It so happened that a space of at least 500 yards intervened between the column led by Sir Jas. Scarlett and the column led by myself. Immediately that Sir Jas. Scarlett saw a column of Russian Cavalry cross the ridge, he formed his two regiments into line, supported by the 5th Dragoon Guards, and charged into the middle of them, and no men or set of men could have behaved more gallantly. We were, as I told you, at a distance of 500 yards behind them. I saw that an advantage could be gained and took it. We charged at the right flank of the Russian column. That column contained, we calculated—and it has never been stated otherwise—at least 3500 men, whereas the whole amount of British Dragoons engaged on that day did not exceed 700 men. (Vehement cheering). Gentlemen, our charge had such an effect that the Russians fled and broke before us to a man, and it pleased Providence (and most thankful have I been for it) that our loss was but small on that occasion. The chief loss that we sustained was afterwards in supporting the noble charge of the light brigade, when that brigade was nearly annihilated. (Hear. hear.) We were called upon to support them, and were thus necessarily put under the fire of the Russian batteries; and there our chief loss was sustained. Nevertheless I cannot but return thanks to Providence that in the whole of that war the 4th Dragoon Guards did not lose a single officer. (Applause.) We have lost 62 gallant fellows, who lie buried near Sebastopol or on the heights of Varna, and several others have returned to their native country unfit for military duty or for the support of themselves. But there is one thing that I am quite satisfied with, and that is, the number of horses we have brought home. There was a commission sent out into the Crimea, who in their report stated that the officers commanding the cavalry regiments had starved their horses. (A voice, "Lucan.") No, no, it was no fault of Lord Lucan's. (Applause.) No officer of the whole army had the country more at heart than had Lord Lucan. (Hear, hear.) You have this day seen in the ranks a number of the horses which embarked with us in 1854, and though you have been told that 97 per cent. of the horses had been lost, yet I assure you that I have brought back to England in safety one-fifth of the whole number of horses we took out. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, it has been most gratifying to us to be received here to-day in the manner in which we have; and my brother officers and myself feel most grateful to the whole of the inhabitants of Leeds. I regret that circumstances of a peculiar nature have prevented me from making Leeds the headquarters of the regiment. I do not wish it to be supposed that the selection of headquarters remained with anybody but myself. The Quarter-master General offered in the handsomest manner to take which place I pleased. I have 700 recruits, and I must make a regiment out of them, and I therefore desired to get them into the barracks which contained the greatest amount of accommodation. As the general commanding the district offered me accommodation for 500 men in the barracks at Sheffield, I felt obliged to select that town. I hope, therefore, you will not think that my not coming here has arisen from any dislike to come among you. (Hear, hear.) Gentlemen, I beg leave to return you our sincere thanks for the honour you have done us. (Three cheers and one cheer more for Col. Hodge.)

The MAYOR next gave "Our Gallant Allies." Those allies, he said, had joined them in fighting their noble battles for a righteous cause, and though they had long been enemies, he hoped they would still longer be friends. (Applause, with three times three, and one for the Sardinians.)

The MAYOR then proposed "The Royal Artillery, and the health of Major Frazer." They had all heard of the great exploits of their artillery—they were instrumental in deciding the battle of the Alma—they prevented the Russians making progress at Balaklava—and they were also at Inkerman. Major Frazer was at the battle of Inkerman, and he also nobly did his duty in the trenches, a work of which they heard very little, but there could be no question that it was perhaps the most arduous work that could be undertaken during the whole war, arising from the incessant alarms and sorties to which they were subject during both night and day. He had the greatest pleasure in proposing the toast.

Major FRAZER acknowledged the toast, and thanked them for the manner in which they had drunk the health of the corps to which he belonged. That corps had certainly a good many duties to perform, and duties which were hard, and to which the men had not been trained. In the trench work they had many men who had never seen heavy guns, having been trained for field service, but they had to work those guns, and they got through them somewhere. They had always attempted to do their duty, and always would attempt to do it. (Hear, hear.) His principal labour was in the trenches. He certainly was at Inkerman, having gone up to join his company, who expected every moment to be engaged, but they were not. On behalf of the officers and himself he returned them his most sincere thanks.

Mr. JOHN GOTT proposed the next toast. He said the programme put into his hands did him the honour to mention his name as the proposer of a toast on that occasion, and he could not but think it both honourable and highly becoming to take any part in such interesting proceedings. For what could be more honourable than to pay honour where it was so evidently and so highly due. (Hear, hear.) They had had that day one of the most striking sights that it had ever, in a long life time, been his lot to witness in the town of Leeds. Such a display of public feeling—spontaneous, general, unanimous—could not be exceeded by any town or any country; and he trusted that the expression of their feelings would prove gratifying to those brave men in whose honour it had been shown. They were entitled to it. During the war the people had felt this, and were most happy in having the opportunity of showing that feeling, on the occasion of their return, full of honours. But it was not with respect to that that the toast which had been put into his hands applied. No doubt to some extent it did, for they were portions of the same respected and endeared body of men. The reputation which the army of England had earned—high as it was, increased as it ever would be whenever it was put to the trial—high as it was acknowledged throughout the world—that reputation was necessarily bought at a costly price. Who was there, military or civilian, who had not felt during the last two years of this late war—deeply felt the loss of some dear relative, valued friend, or brave and respected comrade? But the memory of those men who had died in a far-off land, and lay buried in some distant spot, would live as long and much longer than their lives lasted—because they would form a part, an important part, of the history of England. It was a subject, however, which should be treated by one more eloquent than himself, he would not say by one more feeling, for it had been to him throughout a deep feeling; but his object then was to request them to pay due honour to the toast which he had the pleasure to propose. Before, however, he proposed it, he wished to say that he hoped they would drink not only to the memory of their own brave countrymen, but also to the memory of the countrymen of their faithful and attached allies. They had shared the same dangers, been partakers of the same sufferings—and fought together and met the same death—they were, therefore, entitled to the same honours, and would be partakers of the same glory. (Applause.) He begged to propose “The memory of their countrymen, and the countrymen of our brave allies who have fallen during the late war.” The toast was drunk in solemn silence.

The Rev. W. SINCLAIR rose to give the next toast—“Miss Nightingale and the Ladies,”—which was given with three times three cheers.

Colonel HODGE said it afforded him great pleasure to rise and propose “The Mayor and Town of Leeds.” Himself and brother officers had every reason truly to be thankful to them for the kind and enthusiastic manner in which they had been received, and for the noble entertainment which had been given to them, and for the hospitality to their fellow-soldiers. (Hear, hear.) What sight could have been more beautiful than their town that day, with the windows of the principal thoroughfares filled with lovely women, and the streets thronged with happy smiling faces. No town in the world, he was sure, could have produced anything more beautiful. This came from the blessings of peace—from keeping war from their own country. (Hear, hear.) They who were lately returned from the Crimea had but too good opportunities of seeing what a frightful thing war was when brought into a happy and smiling land. When they entered the Crimea they found the country teeming with plenty—the towns were happy, and Sebastopol itself was one of the most beautiful towns he ever saw—they found vineyards, and gardens, and woods, and everything to indicate plenty; when they left it, from no fault of theirs, the country was a desert. Russian families who had returned were unable to discover where their houses had stood. Now they must remember that to keep a war from their land should be the feeling of every Englishman, and that they must be patient under a taxation unknown throughout the remainder of the world, if they deserved to be enabled to keep war from their own doors. Now that peace had come again, don't let their establishments be diminished. (Loud cheers.) Beyond everything succour the navy—remember that the wooden walls of England had long been her safe-guard. Depend upon it when war came the army would do its duty, and he must say he thought it was more easily created than the navy. He was on board the Sanspareil, Captain Dacres, when the navy attacked Sebastopol, and nothing could exceed the ability with which the ship was taken into action, and the coolness of the men, and their attention to duty, though it was reported that the ship was on fire three times, and that the magazine had to be closed twice because of the progress of the fire. The sailors also afforded valuable aid after the battle of the Alma in succouring the wounded, and they ought to be most thankful to the navy for what they did. (Hear, hear.) He again thanked them for the manner in which they had been received, and regretted that his military duties would not permit his remaining amongst them, but he should leave behind him those who would be most happy to cultivate the most perfect friendship with them, and, indeed, one of them, Captain Gunter, had purchased an estate in the neighbourhood. He concluded by giving the toast. (Applause.)

The MAYOR, in responding, said that as the chief magistrate, he thought nothing could be more honourable than to be placed in the position he then held. It was most gratifying to have witnessed the immense masses they had seen that day, so anxious, at some sacrifice no doubt to themselves, to give to the heroes then present and to those in a neighbouring tent a hearty reception. Nothing could be more gratifying than the feeling exhibited. He thanked them for the manner in which they had drunk the toast.

This concluded the list of toasts, and the Mayor and officers proceeded to the Riding-school where the men were then regaled with a substantial repast.

During the banquet, the bands in attendance played appropriate music in the intervals between the speeches.

After the printed list of toasts had been exhausted, and a portion of the company had left the marquée,

Mr. W. MATTHEWS, ex-Mayor of Sheffield, addressing the remainder, said that it was upon such an occasion as the present that the power of old England was felt. A demonstration, such as the one which had been made, showed to every one what England could do, and that she knew right well how to do it when called upon. He had come from Sheffield, partly for the sake of observation, but infinitely more because he felt that it was right to render honour to whom honour was so eminently due. One thing he could assure them, namely, that however well these proceedings had been got up in Leeds, he should take care that, if possible, the inhabitants of Sheffield should beat the people of Leeds on the occasion of a similar event which was to take place in that town in a day or two. But after all this, such a rivalry was an honourable rivalry, and showed to those who had been ready to live and die for their country, that such services were most highly valued and appreciated.

THE DINNER TO THE SOLDIERS.

About half-past four o'clock the non-commissioned officers and privates sat down to a substantial dinner, and an ample supply of ale, &c., which had been provided in the Riding School, and of which a considerable number of the artillery and the police-force also partook. Altogether about 400 sat down. Several rows of tables were arranged in the spacious school, and the building was tastefully decorated and hung round with flags, banners, &c. Two brass bands were stationed in the school, and played a selection of cheering and enlivening music at intervals.

During the repast, the proceedings in the marquée having terminated, the Mayor, the officers, Mr. Barr, Mr. P. O'Callaghan, Mr. H. Richardson, and other gentlemen entered the school, and were received with much applause. They seemed very anxious that every attention should be paid to the gallant Dragoons, and Mr. J. I. Ikin especially took great pains to secure the comfort of the soldiers and to see that they were well provided for.

During the time that the Mayor remained, his WORSHIP proposed the health of the Queen, a toast, he said, which he was sure would be received as it ought to be received. (Cheers.) The manner in which they responded to it, assured him that they were ready to fight for her Majesty as they had already fought for her, though it was impossible that they could fight better than they had done. No soldiers could have fought better for their country, and no soldiers had deserved more of their country, than the British soldiers. (Applause.) Her Majesty had proved that she appreciated them; and that she had shown the tender affection which she had towards her soldiers by visiting the wounded and the sick. He was quite sure that there was nothing which was dearer to the heart of the Queen than to hear of the well-being of her soldiers. (Loud cheering.) He was very glad indeed that they had so enthusiastically received the toast which he had proposed. (Applause.)

H. RICHARDSON Esq., gave the next toast. He said that the occasion on which they had met was one of the most happy, namely, the restoration of peace after a bloody, but a triumphant, and he would most confidently add, a just and righteous war. It was very much owing to some of the gallant soldiers whom they had that day met to receive that the war had been conducted to so glorious a termination; but whilst he praised the 4th Dragoons, and did not for a moment wish to deteriorate their glories, he would not retract from the merits of their enemies. The foes which they met were not Eastern, weak-stricken soldiers, who could be swept from the field at the first flash of artillery, but they were men who had met the troops of the great Napoleon, and even he had not been able to rout them, though he might have gained the field. There were men who had fought in the present war against the English soldiers who had three times charged up to the muzzle of the guns; there were men who, when they assailed Kara, and were repulsed by the valiant General Williams, fought nobly and bravely; yet on the bloody field of Balaklava such men as these, though in the overwhelming number of five to one, were swept away like the morning mist before the sun. In effecting such deeds as these, against fearful odds, the English soldiers had accomplished heroic acts such as the world had scarcely ever witnessed, and which had never been seen except when performed by Britons. (Applause.) He had been called upon rather unexpectedly, but he had the greatest pleasure in proposing the toast which had been entrusted to him, namely, "The army and navy." He would no longer occupy their time by keeping them from their festivities, but he would conclude by assuring the 4th Dragoon Guards that he spoke from his own heart, and he was sure he expressed the feelings of every one of his fellow-townsmen, when he said that he felt for them the most profound esteem, the warmest admiration, and the deepest gratitude.

P. O'CALLAGHAN, Esq., who was received with much applause, said though he was at present on half-pay as an officer of the 11th Hussars, some of the happiest years of his life had been spent in the 4th Dragoon Guards. His son was born in the regiment, and he intended that he should have appeared amongst them that day in the uniform of the military school to which he belonged, but he had unfortunately been prevented from being present in consequence of having dislocated one of his wrists. He regretted to say that in looking over the regiment he recognised very few old faces; out of the whole number there were only, he believed, two serjeant-majors, and four privates, that he remembered as being in the regiment 15 years ago. There was a time when duty obliged him to think anxiously about their health, but he had never taken a deeper interest in the health, the safety, and the welfare of the Royal Irish Dragoon Guards than he had done lately. (Applause.) After expressing the pleasure and gratification which it afforded him to see the reception which the regiment had met with in Leeds, Mr. O'Callaghan concluded by proposing the healths of General Sir James Chatterton, formerly colonel in the regiment when stationed in Leeds, of Colonel Hodge, and the Fourth Dragoon Guards. (Cheers.)

The festive proceedings continued for some time longer. Every person present entered heartily into the spirit of the feast, and nothing occurred to mar the general happiness.

BANQUET TO THE OFFICERS OF THE FOURTH DRAGOON GUARDS, LORD CARDIGAN, "REDAN MASSEY," &c., AT SHEFFIELD.

On Tuesday, July 29th, 1856, a Dinner was given to the Officers of the 4th Dragoon Guards at Sheffield, on their return from the Crimea, and taking up their head quarters in that town.

Wm. Fawcett, Esq., Mayor, presided; and amongst the guests present by invitation were Major-General the Earl of Cardigan, the Right Hon. Lord Wharcliffe, the Hon. James Stuart Wortley, Col. Hodge, C.B., of the 4th Dragoon Guards, Lieutenant-Colonel Rainier, of the 98th infantry regiment, Lieut. W.G.D. Massey of the 19th regiment, (known as "Redan Massey"), and the following officers of the 4th Dragoon Guards:—Captains M'Creagh, Robertson, and M'Donnel; Lieutenants Shawe and Ponsford; Cornets Armstrong, Gokkie, and Baumgarten; Paymaster Briggs, Adjutant Harran, Surgeon Cooper, Veterinary-surgeon Byrne, Quarter-Master Drake, and Riding-master Price. There were also present Captain Lowe, (aide-de-camp to Lord Cardigan), Captain Minchin, (barrack-master), Major Vincent Corbett, Captain Grantham, Lieutenant Reed, Lieutenant Twyford, and Ensign Griffin, (of the 98th regiment), Ald. Dunn, H. Atkin, Esq., &c.

The loyal toasts were given by the Mayor. In reply to the toast of the Army and Navy,

The Earl of CARDIGAN said,—Mr. Mayor and members of the Council of Sheffield, my Lord and Gentlemen, I believe it devolves upon me, as senior officer here present, to return thanks for the army. I rise willingly to do so, however imperfectly I may be able to perform the task. Gentlemen, I have no doubt that during the services of our army in the Crimea you have all carefully and attentively watched their proceedings on that service, and no doubt you have done so with much interest. (Hear, hear.) Gentlemen, I will say very little about the army for whom I am returning thanks. I will only remind you—and I think you will all be aware—of the splendid services of that invincible infantry of ours which carried the heights of Alma, driving out an enormous force of Russians, posted in a strong position—in a time of between two and three hours dispersing and driving that army from its formidable position. (Hear, hear.) Gentlemen, you are aware with what determination and with what vigour, and with what gallantry that same infantry defended the heights of Inkerman against a sudden attack. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) I say more or less a surprise; and I say this without meaning any affront to or without any detraction from the merits of anybody, because it is perfectly clear that the Russian army might upon any occasion, upon any one of those positions of our army, make a night attack, or a very early attack in the morning. Gentlemen, upon that occasion, as you know, a small force of our army engaged, vanquished, and drove out a powerful Russian army, putting, as I had it at the time from the best authority, between 16,000 and 20,000 Russians hors de combat. Gentlemen, you know how gallantly, how arduously, and how zealously that infantry served in the trenches during the long siege and previous to the taking of the town of Sebastopol. (Hear, hear.) I will only add, gentlemen, that I am perfectly convinced you are aware of the great services of that branch of our army. And I trust that wherever and whenever her Majesty's cavalry have been called upon to act, they have done their duty to the best of their ability. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) Gentlemen, having noticed two branches of the army, perhaps it would be scarcely right for me to sit down without saying that no gentleman here present can be ignorant of the constant and arduous services of her Majesty's artillery. (Hear, hear, and applause.) Gentlemen, with these few words I beg, in the name of all my brother officers here present, and for the army generally, to return you my best thanks for the honour you have done them in drinking their health.

The MAYOR next gave the toast of the evening, announcing that the Duke of Cambridge had been prevented from accepting the invitation, by a previous engagement; General Windham, by a public breakfast given to him this day at Leamington; and Sir Harry Smith, by an engagement to go into Devonshire. Gentlemen, I think it is no ordinary occasion on which we are met together, the occasion being to welcome a gallant regiment from the seat of war. You have all taken a great interest, I have no doubt, in watching the progress of events from time to time, and we now can conclude that our army have, under all the circumstances, behaved in a manner entitling them to our highest admiration. And Sheffield is not the only part of her Majesty's dominions that entertains an opinion of this kind, for I observe, in a newspaper published in Montreal, a feeling amongst our fellow-countrymen in that part of our colonies, which is thus expressed:—"They have watched with a deep and absorbing interest the events of the late war, which has been characterised by greater suffering, more patient endurance, a more magnanimous courage, and loftier heroism, than perhaps distinguished any other struggle of arms recorded in history." (Hear, hear.) I have to refer to that regiment which we are called upon this day to honour,—the Fourth Dragoon Guards. (Vociferous cheering.) You are aware that they did not arrive at the seat of war until after the battle of the Alma, and consequently could take no part in that engagement. But they were engaged in those nightly troubles which arose out of duty in the trenches, and where, with their horses, they had to endure the severest possible hardships. But it was at the close of the battle of Balaklava that the regiment distinguished itself the most. It was an attack on the right flank of the Russians, in connexion with the Enniskillens and the Scotch Greys. There were only 700 dragoons, and they were opposed to about 3,500 Russians. Those Russians were entirely routed. They fled before those 700 dragoons. (Hear, hear, and applause.)

Lord Raglan might well say "Well done!" and characterise it as one of the most successful attacks he had ever witnessed. The smallness of the loss that was sustained by our troops was a matter of astonishment. But so determined were they, and so thoroughly routed were their enemies, that the loss of the regiment we are now honouring was exceedingly small. Afterwards, however, they did suffer severely. Exposure during cold nights, the want of forage for the horses and food for the men, caused them to suffer excessively. And it was greatly owing to the care and judgment of Colonel Hodge that that suffering was not much worse than it really was, for they suffered as little, if not less than any other regiment in the Crimea. I am glad to say that Colonel Hodge is a soldier by birth. His father before him was a gallant soldier. Unfortunately, he was killed the night immediately preceding the battle of Waterloo. He had been ordered, in the face of certain death, to charge a troop of French cavalry and artillery, and unfortunately he met his death. I think these are sufficient reasons why we should give a most hearty reception to-night to Col. Hodge and the Fourth Dragoon Guards. (Loud and sustained applause.) During the war they have had our constant wishes for their success. Our strong desire, and our prayer also, I have no doubt, was that they might be successful in the just cause in which they were engaged. I am sure that, with me, you will wish to convey to them your sense of confidence that they would do their duty, and to assure them that they have our warmest support. I am sure we all feel that if they should be again called upon to engage in similar duties, they would discharge those duties as Englishmen and as true British soldiers, as they have hitherto done. Gentlemen, I therefore ask you to fill your glasses, and let us join most cordially in drinking "The health of Colonel Hodge and the Officers of the Fourth Dragoon Guards." (Three times three and many more vehement cheers.)

Colonel HODGE was received with great enthusiasm :—He said, Mr. Mayor, Master Cutler, my Lords, and Gentlemen, I rise to thank you most sincerely for the very cordial manner in which you have been pleased to receive the toast of the health of my brother officers and myself; and I beg also to thank you for this public mark of your approbation that you have given to us upon coming to the town of Sheffield, and for this splendid public entertainment with which we are now received by you. Our progress from Nottingham, both to Leeds and Sheffield, was, I assure you, of a most gratifying kind. I do not regard this as a compliment exclusively to myself and to my brother officers. It is a mark of respect to the British army at large. (Cheers.) And as individuals in that army we return our sincere thanks. Nothing, I assure you, was more gratifying to us upon our return to our native country than to find that all classes welcomed us at every town we came to. (Cheers.) During that dreadful winter of 1854, when sickness and want of good and proper food weakened and impaired nearly every individual there present, whether he was an officer or a private soldier, nothing cheered us more than to read of the sympathy that was felt for us in our native land. (Loud cheering.) It cheered us in the hour of suffering, and it enabled many a man, I am confident, to bear up against privations under which he would otherwise have sunk. (Applause.) I also wish to thank you for the generous and noble subscriptions that were raised, both in Sheffield and throughout the land, for the widows and children of those who fell ;—(renewed cheering;)—and not only for those who fell, but for the support of those soldiers' children and wives that were left behind at home. Many and many a married soldier's heart was cheered by the knowledge that a grateful country was feeding his family and supporting his children. (Loud cheers.) This reflection enabled him to do his duty and to think of nothing more. Gentlemen, there has been an appointment lately made which I am sure to the army at large is one of the greatest gratification—(cheers).—I refer to the fact of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge being appointed Commander-in-Chief. Gentlemen, there is no officer in the British service who more thoroughly understands his duty, or more thoroughly appreciates or better knows the working officers of the army than does his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge. (Applause.) In fact, to use a common expression, I think we have now put "the right man in the right place." (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, I will not detain you much longer, (Go on!) I assure you it is with feelings of the greatest gratification that the Fourth Dragoon Guards have come amongst you. I trust that the associations which will arise out of this night's entertainment will long endure in our minds, and I am sure we shall make many friends here and wherever we go. In conclusion, gentlemen, I beg to return you our sincere thanks for the honour you have done us, and I beg to drink to your very good healths. (The gallant Colonel resumed his seat amidst much cheering.)

Mr. Aldermann DUNN proposed the health of the Duke of Norfolk. (Loud cheers.)

MICHAEL ELLISON, Esq., returned thanks on behalf of the Duke.

H. ATKIN, Esq. proposed the health of the Right Honourable the Earl of Cardigan, which was drunk with much applause.

Lord CARDIGAN rose amidst cheers. When the applause had subsided, his Lordship said—Mr. Mayor, Gentlemen of the Corporation of Sheffield, my Lords, and Gentlemen, in rising to return thanks to you for the honour you have conferred upon me in drinking my health, I must commence by stating what great pleasure I have had in attending this great entertainment on the present occasion; and I will say how much I regret that some of those general officers who have equally had the honour of being invited with myself—many of whom greatly distinguished themselves in the Crimea—have not been able to accept your kind invitation. Gentlemen, I feel great pleasure on various accounts in being present on this occasion. In the first place, I have the advantage of being present at a very interesting ceremony—that of the reception by the Mayor and Corporation and other authorities of this great and wealthy town of this distinguished corps just returned to England. (Hear, hear.) Gentlemen, I have also the honour and advantage of renewing my acquaintance with that corps which I formerly had when I commanded them some years ago. I come down, gentlemen, to this quarter, not having previously had an opportunity, in the situation which I hold on the staff of the cavalry, of seeing this distinguished regiment since its return from the seat of war, and being enabled to form an opinion as to its efficiency and good order; but I have no doubt I shall find it in a very perfect state, so far as circumstances will admit. Gentlemen, I can say something from my own personal knowledge of the services of this regiment. Having been present on the 25th of October, 1854, I witnessed the attack of a large force of Russian cavalry on the heavy brigade. I saw, from the heights I occupied as commander of the light cavalry brigade, the Greys and Enniskillens as it were for a moment surrounded by the Russian cavalry, I believe the 4th Dragoon Guards were at that moment under the guidance and command of Colonel Hodge. (Loud cheers.) A most judicious and effective charge was made on the left flank of the Russian cavalry, which in conjunction in some degree with a simultaneous movement on the other flank by the Fifth Dragoons Guards, led in a great measure to the discomfiture and total rout of the Russians. (Loud cheers.) I may say this, gentlemen, that your guests on the present occasion—your chief guests, the 4th Dragoon Guards, under the gallant command of Colonel Hodge, performed a most important duty on that occasion. Gentlemen, it was after this—later in the day—when it came to the turn of the light cavalry to attack. Some of the regiments of the heavy brigade were moved forward in the way of a demonstration and as a support. That support was not in any way effective, owing to the intensity of the flank fire of those batteries through which the light cavalry had to pass for the purpose of attacking the battery in front. It therefore happened that this regiment, the 4th Dragoon Guards, and other regiments of the heavy brigade, were greatly exposed for a very considerable time; they had a great many men wounded and some killed; they lost a great number of horses; and they had many gallant officers severely wounded; amongst others I would name Colonel York, of the 1st Royals, who never recovered from the wounds he received on that occasion. As to the gentleman who so kindly proposed my health, I beg to return him my sincere thanks for the manner in which he introduced it. He has been kind enough to say a word or two with regard to the light brigade on the day of Balaklava. Gentlemen, I am not going into any details of what was done by the light brigade on that occasion. I perfectly agree with the honourable gentleman who was kind enough to propose my health, that the subject has been thoroughly discussed and is very well known. I will merely say that, receiving an order which was conceived to be a misconception of what Lord Raglan intended, the brigade was ordered to attack the battery in front—an exposed battery flanked by a vast number of Russian riflemen; that in performance of this duty, which lasted, from the time of moving off to returning to the same spot, for about twenty-five minutes, there were upwards of three hundred officers, non-commissioned officers, and men put hors de combat, and 396 horses killed. I will say no more with regard to the charge with which you have done me the honour to couple my name, except to express my real, perfect belief, that there was not an officer nor a man in that brigade who did not act up to that order which was given, and who did not perform the duty required of him in the most gallant way. Gentlemen, having said thus much, and having pointed out to you the important services performed by the regiment whom you are now honouring with this kind reception this evening, I will merely touch on some observations of the Mayor of Sheffield respecting Colonel Hodge's ancestor; and I would say that Colonel Hodge has, independently of all his exertions and the long course of attention he has paid to his profession in passing his life in a career of military studies—I will say that in addition he has hereditary claims to military distinction, from the services of his father and the fate which that gallant officer met. Gentlemen, I feel grateful to you for the attention with which you have listened to me, and I beg to return you my sincere thanks for the honour you have done me in connecting my name with the services done by the light cavalry brigade on the day of Balaklava.

WILSON OVEREND, Esq., proposed the health of Lord Wharncliffe, and his LORDSHIP returned thanks for the compliment.

W. F. DIXON, Esq., proposed the health of "Lieut.-Colonel Rainier and the 98th Regiment," to which the gallant Colonel responded.

J. JOBSON SMITH, Esq., next rose and said—Mr. Mayor, my Lords, and Gentlemen, I rise to propose the health of certainly not the least distinguished guest at our table to day. In times of peace the soldier, as well as the man of science and of business, often finds the road to distinction both long and tedious; but it has been the good fortune of the young man whose health I have to propose to you to have already in early life obtained an imperishable name. Gentlemen, I propose this toast to you with great emotion; for who can look at that young man—who can think of that young man, and recollect the dreadful conflict at the Redan, and associate with it his sustained courage, his noble patriotism, and not give an English welcome to Lieutenant Massey? (Enthusiastic cheering.) He has already laid his country under an obligation—an obligation which that country feels pleasure in repaying, and we may thank Providence for having preserved his life, which I hope will be honourably spent, and that the close of it may be as distinguished as the beginning. (Cheers.) I propose "The health of Lieutenant Massey." (Drunk with three times three)

Lieutenant MASSEY, on rising was received with immense applause. He said—Mr. Mayor, my Lords, and Gentlemen, I beg to return you my hearty thanks for the great honour you have done me in inviting me to this banquet; and for the kind manner in which Mr. Smith has proposed my health, and the generous and hearty manner in which it has been received. (Loud applause.) I do not know that I deserve such a compliment. (Cheers.) I am sure I simply did my duty, and only what any other officer, placed in my position, would have done—(applause)—for we all felt that the honour of old England was in our keeping—(enthusiastic cheers)—and that we would have died a thousand deaths to have preserved it untarnished. (Great applause.) Unaccustomed as I am to such occasions as this, I could not deny myself the pleasure of being present on the occasion of this tribute being paid to the 4th Dragoon Guards, especially as it gives me the opportunity of thanking the people of Sheffield, and the people of England in general, for the kind and warm feeling which has been manifested in so many ways. (Applause.) I will not trespass upon your time any longer, and again return you my most sincere thanks for the honour you have done me. Lieut. Massey resumed his seat amid enthusiastic cheers.

Mr. Ald. BARKER proposed "The health of the West Riding Magistrates," for which Mr. OVEREND returned thanks.

Col. HODGE gave "The Mayor and Corporation of Sheffield," and the Mayor returned thanks.

Mr. Ald. MATTHEWS proposed "The immortal memory of the brave men who fell in the Crimea," which was drunk in solemn silence.

WILLIAM SMITH, Esq., of Dam House, proposed "The health of the Rev. Canon Sale and the Clergy," and Mr. Sale responded.

Lord WHARNCLIFFE proposed "The health of the Master Cutler and the Cutlers' Company."

The MASTER CUTLER returned thanks.

WM. SMITH, Jun., Esq., proposed "The health of Miss Florence Nightingale," and the toast was drunk with enthusiasm.

WILSON OVEREND, Esq., proposed "The health of the Duke of Cambridge and the Emperor of the French." This toast was drunk with three times three.

The MAYOR then proposed the last toast—"The town and trade of Sheffield."

A great part of the company remained for some time longer to have the opportunity of personally complimenting Lieut. Massey, whose youthful appearance, and lameness caused by his dangerous wounds at the storming of the Redan, excited great interest.

TREAT TO THE MEN OF THE FOURTH DRAGOON GUARDS AT SHEFFIELD.

The Dragoons, to the number of 245, and 20 discharged soldiers from the Crimea, were feasted at the Botanical Gardens, Sheffield, on Thursday, July 31st. It is estimated that about 25,000 people were present, to witness the festival and to do honour to the brave. There was a general half-holiday in that town. More than a hundred flags were displayed and great enthusiasm prevailed. The soldiers were addressed by the Mayor of Sheffield, the Rev. the Vicar, Mr. Ald. Dunn, Mr. Overend, Colonel Hodge, and Serjeant-Majors Joice and Williams acknowledged the treat. The whole affair went off admirably.

PRESENT FROM SHEFFIELD TO THE FOURTH DRAGOON GUARDS.

On Monday evening, Sept. 8th, 1856, the anniversary of the Fall of Sebastopol was celebrated by a very interesting ceremony at New Hall Gardens, Sheffield. The ceremony consisted in the presentation of a valuable pen and pocket knife to each of the surviving officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of the 4th Dragoon Guards (now principally stationed at Sheffield), who were with their regiment on its landing in the Crimea and passed through the Crimean campaigns. The knives, 225 in number, are the gift of Mr. Thomas Youdan, proprietor of the Surrey Music Hall, Sheffield, and have been manufactured by Mr. Wostenholm, of the Washington works. They each contain six blades, are extremely handsome in design, and are of the best material and workmanship, having cost about £100. On one side of each knife is the name of the recipient, with the words "Balaklava, Inkerman, Sebastopol," as on the Crimean clasp; and the following inscription on the reverse side:—Presented to the Crimean Heroes of the Fourth Dragoon Guards, by Thomas Youdan, Sheffield." Only 144 of the knives were distributed at Sheffield, the remainder having been sent to Leeds and Bradford to be distributed among the detachments there.

The presentation was made by WILSON OVEREND, Esq., Dep.-Lt. of the W. Riding.

The presentation having been acknowledged by Captain M'CREEGH, in the unavoidable absence of Colonel Hodge.

MR. ROEBUCK said,—Soldiers, I have been asked to address you in order that I may express on behalf of the town which I represent the sympathy which they all feel for you, not only in the position which you now hold, but that which you have held. Great indeed have been the sufferings of the British army. Hereafter they will understand that great as may have been their sufferings, the people of this country are alive to everything that happens to our army; that we consider you are brethren; that we revere the institution to which you belong; and that we will direct all our efforts to render that institution beneficial to our country and glorious to yourselves. (Cheers.) It gives me pleasure to behold you now again in times of peace. Not that I am one of those who hail the peace that has come with great pleasure. But you are among your fellow-countrymen. They have received you with that cordial sympathy which I know will cheer the British army in times to come, when difficulties may rise, and when they will have to face again the enemies of this country in the field. When that time comes you will be ready. (Hear, hear.) When that time comes we will support you. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) When that time comes you will do your duty, and we shall appreciate you for having done it. Be you assured that this is but a slight token of the feeling of the people of this country. (Cheers.) It is the straw which shows you which way the wind blows. (Loud cheers.) The men of England respond to you. They are with you. They know the difficulties that you overcome; and they welcome your return from them. Men of peace we are. We know full well the blessings of peace, and it is because we do so know them we appreciate you, who are men of war; for by your efforts those blessings are maintained. It is a great mistake to suppose that the English army is in any way opposed to Englishmen. They are the protectors of England; they are the protectors of our glory; they are the protectors of our freedom. We love you as brethren, and we know that you will protect us as such. Gentlemen, I have very imperfectly performed the duty imposed upon me. I beg heartily to return you the thanks of this town—of England, aye, and I may say of the whole world—for the deeds you have done, the gallantry you have shown, and the devotion you have manifested to England and all that belongs to her.
